Excerpt from The Political Questions of the Day: An Address Delivered at Broadway Hall, Oakland, December 24th, 1873 Among the weaknesses of human nature to which all men are subject, and which all wise men deplore, is that of procrastination. The most trivial and common-place affairs are allowed to push aside those serious matters that should be the rule of conduct and guide of life. Of the duties thus deferred, is that of attending to public affairs and of investigating those things which it is everybody's business to act upon, but which are seldom duly considered and examined till the time for action is close at hand. Then it is when impartial investigation is impossible, when in the heat and excitement of a political canvass the judgment is warped and blinded by partisan prejudice, that most people give any serious attention to the affairs of State; and as they are by this time no longer open to argument or conviction, they follow their old-time leaders in their efforts to glorify their party and justify themselves in...
