Not illustrated. 1915 edition. Excerpt: .thirdyear class of the regular primary school. Half-day school The establishment of half-day schools was sanctioned as early as 1906 upon the request of Liu Hsiieh Chien, a certain governmental official. The motives which called forth such schools, as well as their aims, are similar to those of the language-made-easy schools. Reformed private schools The educational authorities, realizing that the financial condition of the country would not permit for some time to come the provision of a sufficient number of modern schools for the masses, decided in 1910 to make use of the traditional schools that were found in great numbers throughout the country, such as schools maintained by the public funds for the education of the poor (I Hsiieh), schools established in the ancestral temples or other public buildings for the education of the children of the clan (Shu Shu), schools found in homes of the pupils, and those opened by teachers in their own homes. The plan was to reform these schools through the introduction of modern textbooks and other measures. To carry out this purpose, special courses of study were drawn up for such schools, and graduates of schools which had adopted these courses of study were allowed to enter the schools of the regular system. An experiment was made in Peking in 1907 to test the practicability of the scheme. It was found that the private schools that were able to comply with the requirements numbered only twelve with...
